

Work Study and Internship

As a computer science student, you will eventually work in a job that requires you to apply computer programming skills to solve practical problems. Therefore, being able to apply what you have learned from classes to solve a real-world problem is a critical skill every potential employer will pay attention to. Work studies and internships are two of the best approaches you can use to accumulate practical problem-solving experiences.